

Online Photo Sites: Are You Overexposed?

An Online Privacy Fact Sheet from the ACLU

The more photos you move online, the more digital footprints you leave behind

The information in your online photos is valuable

Moving your photos from photo albums and computer hard drives to online photo services can be convenient. But the photos you upload to these sites—and what you do with them—can say a lot about your interests, habits, beliefs, and concerns. And outdated privacy laws, written before the Internet even existed, mean that all this personal information isn't being properly protected from prying eyes. Don't pay for online photo services by giving up control of your personal information. Demand a privacy upgrade. Demand your dotRights.

Your photos are worth a lot—to companies

When you keep your photos in a photo album or computer at home, you know who can get access to it. When you store them on the Internet, it's harder to be sure. The service you use might look at your photos and other information to build a profile about you: who you are, what you do, and who your friends are. It might use tagging or facial recognition tools to extract even more information from your photos. It might use this profile for targeted advertising, or even share this information with others. And you might not even know any of this is happening.

Your photos are worth a lot—to the government

Your photos are a treasure trove of details about your private life. If you store your pictures in a photo album in your house, the government needs a search warrant to look at them. But when you store those same photos online, the government can take advantage of outdated privacy laws to get its hands on them with a subpoena that a judge has never seen!

Demand control of your photos

You deserve to be able to use online photo services without having to worry that your photos could end up being used in ways you never intended or imagined. It's time to upgrade privacy laws to keep our personal information safe. It's time to stop paying for new technology with our privacy. It's time to Demand our dotRights!
